manually trigger a cable release. With a cable release, the shutter can be triggered by a trigger button on the camera or with a remote device, whether wired or wireless. This allows for spontaneous shots in fast-paced situations such as in sports photography or for telephoto work in which the photographer can control exactly when and where the shutter is released to compose the shot. The cable release can be either attached to a specific camera or released from a remote transmitter, permitting the user to trigger the camera from any desired location. A remote cable release is triggered by the same signal as a camera's shutter, and is usually attached to a specialized release or remote control. Most of the wireless cable releases were designed for sports or event photography, and are used to control the shutter release speed of an SLR camera. There are also simple cable releases designed for other applications. The shutter button or button of a camera can be replaced with a cable release. This is useful for situations where the shutter button is too small for the photographer to easily actuate or is already used by another device, such as an audio mixer or video camera. The Universal Remora cable release can also be used to remotely control the ISO on DSLRs without the front control dial and with very little manual intervention. Since a cable release is mechanically connected to the shutter button it cannot send the same signal as the shutter itself, which is used to trigger the camera shutter. Instead, the cable release applies a different signal to initiate the camera shutter to achieve the same result.

Connecting a cable release to the shutter button allows the photographer to use the cable release not only for triggering the camera shutter but also for certain other camera functions. This is a widely used method to remotely control the camera function, known as a remote release. A cable release is used for the same purpose as the cable for connecting a microphone to a tape recorder. A camera cable can also be used to send the same signal as the cable release.
